The reason I picked engineering is mainly because the freedom that you get to apply your concepts. Normally people would think that my job's mainly offshore or at site, but actually it's a balance between the technical and the commercial aspects of it.

If you look at Petrofac by itself, it's the flexibility that you get to sort of work in so many different aspects of it and get your hands dirty with it.

You will not probably get that in some other company where it's a lot more structurally limited to your own box.

I've started as an engineer and now I'm pretty much in operations where not only I'm looking at the technical, not only just the commercials, but now I'm getting exposed to talking to clients. Now how many of us can actually say that?

On top of everything, what Petrofac has is its people.
